

The Most Devious Language Pattern Ever

In over 20 years of studying hypnosis, NLP, persuasion and mind control I've had a fascination about how to covertly influence people. Much of this covert influence is done in the form of language patterns, words and phrases when spoken act like incantations to create desire, love, want, fear and even depression.

My interest even lead me to write the book Mind Control Language Patterns, along with other books, under the pen name Dantalion Jones.

With this little bit of infamy I've often been asked what language patterns are the most powerful. What language patterns would have the greatest impact on the people who hear them.

My first thought is that there are many and most are describe in the book I just just mentioned above. After much consideration there is one language pattern that I personally fear because I know that when used wrongly it can cripple but I also know it can be use to inspire.

The worst, or best, part of this pattern is its simplicity. I could explain it to you in fewer words or pages but I want you to see, hear and feel it's impact.

What you are about to learn in these few pages I believe rightly to be the most powerful language pattern I've ever heard.

I will describe its origin, why it has such an impact on the human mind and how to use it. You'll learn both the positive and negative applications. You'll be given examples of what to say to see the results of this pattern for both good and bad.

And when you read the inspiring constructive application of this pattern you're apt to smile.

The examples you'll read of the destructive use of these patterns will likely make you cringe as they did me when I first imagined how to them.

For learning The Most Devious Language Pattern Ever I ask of you to be respectful and don't abuse it. You'll understand how you could debilitate someone with it but that would be petty and small minded. Use this pattern in the wrong way and it's also likely to haunt you, or at least I hope it will.

You'll first learn the origin of The Most Devious Language Pattern Ever.

You'll also learn why it works and how the human mind is wired to respond to it.

You'll also be given examples of this pattern being used. Both constructive and destructive uses will be described.

The Origin

This pattern was first revealed to me in the book by Blair Warren “The Forbidden Book of Persuasion”. His book was a huge insight to me when I first read it.

In it he calls this pattern “Revealing The Hidden Thoughts of Others” and explains how it can have such moving effects on people. Since then I described it in my book Mind Control Language Patterns but since then it has resurfaced several ways and has caused me to reevaluate its power in all sorts of applications.

Description

As its original name implies “Revealing The Hidden Thoughts of Others” is much like what it sounds like: you would take aside the person want to influence and tell them what other people are secretly thinking of them. Depending on the result you can watch the effect. If you want them to stop a behavior you tell them their closest friends and associates find their behavior immature, and unprofessional. If you want to encourage them in a newly learned behavior you would tell them people they admire see wonderful potential and recognize how quickly they are learning and how every day they see improvement.

That describes the pattern in a nutshell but to understand it's power let's try to understand why it's so effective.

The Human Being/ The Human Mind

As human beings we are social animals. This is true whether we are introverts or extroverts, whether we have large or small social circle we must interact with people. When we make decision about what to wear, how to dress and act there is always a component of that decision that involves its effect on other people. The only true exception to this is the hermit who has no social interaction and decide things only based on utility. Because, as a hermit, there are no people to interact with, even clothing becomes optional.

When we interact with other people we must act like mind readers, in other words we look at others actions and behaviours and attribute to that act an invisible mental state, an intent or feeling. We all have to do this and we each do it in our own way, some of us are much better at it than others. This act to trying to mind read in psychological terms is called “Theory of mind”.

When you see a person walking down the street looking at his cell phone and he suddenly stops walking reading his phone, you can theorize what he might be thinking or feeling. Something on the phone took all of his attention, but there is no way of truly knowing what is going on.

The same is true when we interact with others. Through their words and body language we make assumptions about what they are thinking and feeling. Generally we are taught to act civilly toward others and most people work hard to present an appearance of kindness and understanding, but our assumptions are never clear pictures. We all make an attempt to perform up to an expectation of others and we assume we are doing it well.

When we are told that others perceive us differently from what we're trying to present we have to completely reevaluate what we are doing. Depending on how it's presented revealing the hidden thoughts of others can be either devastating or uplifting.

The Ideal Pattern

Ideally this pattern should contain the following elements.

- 1) Rapport should be strong between you and the subject you wish to influence.
- 2) Preface your statement in secrecy. Let them know what you're about to tell them is confidential.
- 3) Your statement addresses either a behavior you want your subject to stop doing or a behavior you want them to enhance or feel good about.
- 4) Your statement refers to a third person who is admired or liked by the subject you're trying to influence.
- 5) You describe what the third person thinks or feels about the behavior you want the subject to change.
- 6) Your statement provides evidence that is different from what your subject assumed was thought by the third person.
- 7) Your statement cannot be verified, these are another person's "hidden" thoughts.
- 8) Ultimately, what you tell your subject causes them to reevaluate their behavior and their beliefs about others. At worst they will doubt their perceptions.

Example #1

A friend of mine explained to me how he used this pattern to devastating effect.

My friend, Rob, had a large circle of friends and many of his friends were asking him to join their multi level marketing businesses and finally he had enough. He first openly told his friends he had no interest in becoming a part of someone else's MLM business and to not approach him. To Rob anyone who violated that was open game.

Sure enough, even with the public warning, one of his forewarned friends tried to give him their MLM business presentation. He sat through it patiently and when it was done he told them:

"I've really been wanting to talk to you about this, and it's important. You know you and I have a lot of the same friends and I know I'm not the first person you've presented this to.... I just want to say that you have some very good friends because ... well ... I've spoken to a few of them and ... please don't ask me their names because these people do care about you ... they are not going to tell you this ... but they've all told me how embarrassing it is to see you do this... It's clear to me too ... I can tell you're really trying too hard... and ... well ... I mean, I wish you luck if you want to keep trying... But you should consider how this has been difficult for a reason...this obviously isn't for you."

With a bit of glee, Rob reported his friend dropped his interest in MLM businesses for good and they still remained friends.

By revealing what other people secretly thought of his friends MLM business it created doubt in his perception of himself.

Example #2

This example is using the same process for positive results.

A college football coach takes aside a troubled athlete who is performing below par and says this: "I meet once a week with the university president and last week he and three of college alumni board came in to observe a practice. They all noticed something about you they liked. You practiced hard and when something was difficult you just pushed through it. I've got a whole team to keep an eye on so whatever you were doing keep doing it and if you've got any more let me see of that too. Okay?"

Example #3

A child gets an A on a report card. Her mother wants to encourage her daughter to keep up her studying. She says "Don't tell your father I told you this, but he was so proud of you and the A."

Example #4

You're a single man and friend approaches you and says that an attractive woman you both know commented on how attractive you are.

Example #5

Imagine it yourself!

Pick any one of your personal habits or character traits you think make you interesting and likable. Maybe you feel you have a sense of humor, or consider yourself a easy to talk to. It could also be an interest or hobby you like to talk about or your passion for politics. Having settled on something, imagine a good friend took you aside to tell you they've been selected to tell you how annoying you sound and embarrassing you appear every time you tell a joke, make a speech or talk about your hobby.

You know how you'd feel hearing that from a friend.

Likewise, imagine the same friend telling you how everyone was fascinated by your last presentation, about how they thought you were so funny and love it when you talk about your special hobby. Additionally they would tell you they are proud you're the person representing that particular interest.

If you are like most people you would feel sincerely flattered and validated.

Conclusion

I've titled this The Most Devious Language Pattern Ever for a reason. If you doubt the effectiveness all you have to do is imagine someone doing the pattern on you. The only people whom it would not effect are the rare person who doesn't care about other people's feelings, the sociopath.

Understand the power of this pattern means treating it with respect. As much as this pattern can create inspiration it also can create depression and despair. Please, take it seriously.
